	Report setup To form my test set, I looked through my test_set_one dataset, this contained 500 tweets containing both positive and negative tweets. I then prepared two further test sets, one with tweets I had identified as positive and a second containing tweets which I had identified as negative. I then created a new test set containing only the positive tweets and negative tweets I had identified from the original set. Whilst creating my initial set, I ensured that none of the tweets selected contained more than 140 characters. This was to avoid broken tweets being fed into the test set. analysis After checking the tweets for negative and positive sentiment using VADER, I found that it had correctly classified all of the tweets I had selected. Before running my new test set, I had run VADER on the initial test set and identified that it had actually incorrectly identified some tweets as positive and some tweets as negative. I have discovered that although VADER works particularly well with smaller data sets, in larger datasets it can struggle to correctly identify all positive and all negative tweets correctly. It does however have a considerably accurate model for prediction. VADER particularly appears to struggle with tweets containing both positive and negative sentiments and assessing whether the overall message is positive or negative. An example of this might be tweets
